Who can be liable?

Determining who is at fault for a construction site injury requires an aggressive, intelligent investigation of the accident, a skilled assessment of the physical evidence, and a thorough questioning of witnesses. The experienced construction site accident attorneys at Todd & Weld understand what is required to build a strong legal case of liability and damages.

Those potentially responsible for a construction site injury include the general contractor, subcontractors, or the property owner. Sometimes an injury is caused by a defective tool or job-site equipment, in which case the manufacturer, distributor and retailer of the defective product could be liable. Our attorneys are experienced in handling sophisticated product liability litigation.

What damages are allowed under law?

Construction sites are particularly dangerous with a constant risk of catastrophic injuries, such as fractures, loss of limb, paralysis, traumatic brain injuries, blindness, severe burns, even death. Debilitating injuries can require a lengthy recovery time, as well as lead to mounting medical bills, and extensive loss of wages. An individual's pain and suffering from a traumatic personal injury can be considerable.

Workers' compensation usually covers only a portion of medical bills and lost wages. Workers injured on the job can seek compensation from entities or individuals other than an employer who have caused a construction site injury.

Our experienced and skilled trial attorneys provide an array of resources, including innovative courtroom presentation tools that allow us to tell your story effectively and with compassion. Our lawyers are sensitive to your concerns and spend the time needed to answer your questions and keep you informed as the case moves forward.
